while others would consolidate, change or even expand, officials said. Hepburn hasn't given an exact number of how many may close.

The next step will be to hold meetings with local city leaders as well as parents and community members.

Board members said the effort is necessary to ensure they have the money to pay teachers adequately and provide a variety of electives or special classes to all students, something that is difficult to do when the district operates a lot of half-empty schools.

"I think we should look at this as our opportunity," said School Board member Maura Bulman, who represents the southeast part of the county, which has many low-enrolled schools. "We have to seize this moment right now to make some hard decisions so that when we get out the other end of this, we will have a more robust school district that's going to be very attractive."

Last year, Bulman had supported looking at alternatives to closing schools, including improving marketing and overhauling them in a way that might attract more families.

In January, the district agreed to close one school and revamp five. Four elementary schools were converted into K-8 schools, while one middle school became a 6-12 collegiate academy. But while the changes brought modest enrollment gains to those schools, they were more than offset by large declines in middle schools that had served the same students.

Overall, enrollment in district schools fell 10,360 students over the past year. The district has attributed previous enrollment declines largely to the explosion of charter schools, but this year, charter school enrollment was down by 1,009.

School Board members say a major factor this year is the high cost of living in South Florida, which may be causing families to leave. Miami-Dade and Palm Beach County school districts also experienced major enrollment declines over the past year.

"We have lost over 10,000 students. That's not just because we have competition but people are leaving South Florida because they can't afford it," Board member Rebecca Thompson said. "That's nothing changing to a K-8 or making a specialized program is going to change. ... While I believe schools are the heart of our community, and we need to protect them, we need to face the reality that those 10,000 students aren't coming back."

Thompson represents the Miramar and Pembroke Pines area, which includes a large number of schools that could be affected. But she said "if we're smart about it, if we involve the community in it, then we will make a really cruddy situation better."

The current proposal identifies four geographic regions for elementary schools and four regions for middle schools, where the district will focus and get community input. The elementary school regions are in the Fort Lauderdale, Pembroke Pines, Miramar and Hollywood areas. The middle school zones include the Pembroke Pines, Hollywood, Coral Springs, Sunrise and Plantation areas.

The proposal also identified three high schools that won't close but could face major changes to deal with underenrollment. They are Stranahan High in Fort Lauderdale, Hallandale High and Plantation High.

Broward County School Board members during a workshop at the Kathleen C. Wright Administration Center in Fort Lauderdale on Tuesday.

Three middle schools on the list don't meet the district's criteria for being considered for closure, which is enrollment below 70%. They are Ramblewood Middle and Sawgrass Springs Middle in Coral Springs and Silver Trail Middle in Pembroke Pines, which are all close to 80% full.

That leaves 28 schools that could be considered for closure, although Hepburn tried to downplay that at Tuesday's meeting, saying there are a variety of options for schools that are part of this initiative, which is called "Redefining Broward County Public Schools."

"To remain financially stable and strong for the future, we must right-size our district," he said. "That means some difficult decisions will be necessary, including school closures. To clarify, the focus extends beyond school closures. It is centered on maintaining high standards of excellence for all children across every community in the region, for our county."

Hepburn said the school district "will be transparent in every step of the way. We will engage with staff, parents, and community members directly. Together we will face this challenge and together we will shape a strong future for Broward County's children."
